These factors may include: Age, gender, and frequency of exposure also determine the duration for which THC may linger in your body. Due to the THC's lipid-solubility, it tends to get deposited in the fat cells of your body. It is relatively easier (and faster) for a person with lower body fat to flush out the toxins. Frequent consumption coupled with high body fat can prolong THC retention (and therefore the cleansing procedure) in an individual's body. When you consume weed, your body retains the metabolite residues long after you've used it. These residues are safely stored in your fat cells and are detectable in samples of your urine, blood, hair follicles, and saliva. This is why drug tests are designed to test such samples. For you to fail this test, your urine sample needs to contain 50ng/ml or more THC. Following provided instructions is, therefore, essential for any synthetic urine to work effectively. Now that you're aware of what synthetic urine is, it is time to introduce you to its two types. Depending on what you're comfortable with and what works best for you, you can choose between powdered synthetic urine or liquid synthetic urine. The two have their own pros and cons; however, they do not differ in terms of how effective they are. Both forms of synthetic urine will be effective if you follow the directions. Before you decide on what kind of urine you'd like to use, take a look at this handy comparison. If you're wondering how powdered urine is created, then let's address that curiosity before all else: powdered synthetic urine is dehydrated urine, which to be 'passed' as real requires the addition of distilled water. Using tap water with powdered fake urine is a rookie mistake and will not result in a valid sample.
